

ended only by children, will be held Monday morning. Monday morning an special requiem mass will be attended by members of the various charitables and sisterhoods in the city. And it is expected that prelates in all sections of the country will take part in special services Monday afternoon and evening.

John Murphy Farley, cardinal of the Roman Catholic church, was born on Feb. 20, 1852, at Newtown Hamilton, county Antrim, Ireland, the son of John and Catherine (Murphy) Farley. His father was an innkeeper. Both parents died when he was seven years old, and he was left almost entirely to his own devices.

A successful lawyer, a fair scholar, and a very limited opportunity, living at St. Marcellus, a college in the neighborhood of his home. He proved to be a brilliant student.

Through the interest of an uncle, Farley was able to come to America to seize the opportunities of a traditionally friendly to Irish leaders in this country. He continued the education begun at the little college in the city, attending St. John's in Fordham and at St. Joseph's Seminary in New York. After four years of study at St. Joseph's he was ordained as a priest in Holy City June 11, 1870. He was, therefore, the 50th anniversary of his ordination when death called turning to America. Father Farley died the first two years of his priestly life as assistant rector of St. Peter's at Brighton, Staten Island. In that city his vigor, ability and intelligence led Cardinal Archbishop McCloskey to name him to become his secretary, and 9 years the priest held this post.

Given Title Monsignor
 While serving under Cardinal McCloskey, Father Farley was also rector of St. Gabriel's, a poor and populous parish in East Side of Manhattan. In 1884, Leo XIII. appointed him private secretary, and he was thereafter entitled to use the title "Monsignor." In 1885 he was appointed vicar-general of the diocese of New York. In 1892 he became prelate of Pope Leo, in 1896 apostolic pro-nuncio, and in the same year was named bishop under Archbishop Corrigan.

This capacity Bishop Farley's income and popularity increased so rapidly that long before the demise of Bishop Corrigan it was generally held that Bishop Farley would be the successor. He was appointed in succession to the largest and richest diocese in the United States, was created and proclaimed a cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church on Feb. 19, 1911, at the time that the late Pius X. named Archbishop O'Connor of Boston and Diomedes Falconio, the late Legate at Washington, also member of the Sacred College, was one of the busiest men in the city. He took little part in public affairs, seldom attending public dinners. He found so much to do that his long hours were longer than those of most business men.

was of very regular habits, and was one of the reasons he was able to accomplish so much. Every morning at 6 o'clock and every day he performed the same religious duties of the humblest of her priests. He spent the first part of the new day in meditation, and in saying the "divine office" for the day. This breviary changes every day, and which the priest wherever he may be is required to say daily, consumed about an hour of the cardinal's time. At a quarter of 7 every week day morning Cardinal Farley presided at his own chapel. This is on the third floor of his residence, extending from the city to the back, and every Sunday morning that he did not have to go out of the city he said the 8 o'clock mass at St. Patrick's Cathedral.

Day's Routine Unvaried was accustomed to breakfast at 8 o'clock. His last ever, it was the office of the cardinal to go to his office at 9 o'clock, though in the latter part of his life this practice was discontinued.

cardinal dined at about 1 o'clock, and as soon as this meal was over it was his custom to read the morning newspapers. Thereafter at 5 p. m. he was in his own study to his correspondence, dictated to his secretary. At 8 o'clock he went to his quarters, and he remained out of doors for from 15 to 20 minutes. At 9 o'clock he was served at 8 o'clock, and the cardinal went back to his office to continue work until 10 o'clock. He had many friends and the most prominent and the best man in New York—and the lone man. He had no family. His parents, he recalled, died when he was a child and his brothers and sisters were mened-up courage to jump to the street below. She died almost immediately of her injuries.

The fire started in cans of lacquer stored on the second floor, according to Superintendent Frederick Goerde, who said that an explosion resulted when a defectively insulated electric wire came in contact with one of the cans.

Third Floor Cut Off
 The flames spread rapidly to the roof, and nearly a hundred men and girls at work on the third floor found that not only was escape by means of interior stairs cut off, but that their only other means of exit, a fire escape, was swept by flames which spurted through windows. It was the sight of this seemingly impassable barrier that threw the girls into a panic. Several girls jumped from windows, but most of them ran the gauntlet of flames and reached the street by the fire escape.

Most of the workers on the top floor also descended the fire escape and those who perished lost their lives only when they climbed back after descending part way.

Running into the cloak room they closed the door behind them, thinking to shut out the flames, but the door was soon burned down. One girl was seen on the window sill and was evidently preparing to jump to the ground when suddenly she toppled over backward.

With the first alarm police reserves from all precincts were summoned. Every ambulance also was called out, and many other automobiles were commandeered to carry the injured to hospitals. Several sailors and soldiers, who hastened to the fire, attempted to reach the upper floors and rescue the workers, but they were driven back by smoke and flames.

ARMY PREVENTATIVE FOR SPANISH GRIP
CAMP DEVENS, Sept. 17.—Dichloramide-T, in solution with eucalyptol and liquid vaseline, or combined with chlorocresol, is used in prophylactic treatment as a precaution against Spanish grip here with good results.

This remedy is for doctors only and no layman should attempt its use, as the ingredients are dangerous if used in improper proportions.

SULTAN OF TURKEY TO VISIT VIENNA
AMSTERDAM, Sept. 17.—The Austrian Reichsrath will meet on Oct. 1. The Neue Freie Presse says that the Sultan of Turkey will make a visit to Vienna the end of September.

They say they will not go back to the mines until a more definite agreement is reached as to their demands for an increase in wages. One thousand men are idle at the colliery at Lykens.

OTHERS TO QUIT THURSDAY
 Most of the miners at the Williams-town colliery remain at work, but many of them declare they will quit work Thursday if an adjustment is not made by that time.

surrendered to the police and described how he killed his wife.

INTENDED TO KILL SELF
 He said he shot her in their apartments in the Hotel Cumberland and then failed to carry out his plan to commit suicide. The case will be presented to the grand jury tomorrow morning.

According to Assistant District Attorney McGee, Chapin told him that not only had he intended to commit suicide in Washington four years ago, but that he had intended to kill his wife there, had bought a plot in a cemetery and had selected a monument to be placed over their graves.

Mr. McGee stated that Chapin also
