Righting and Remembering the Nazi Past: “Suppressed Music” in American Concert Performance

LILY E. HIRSCH

On October 4, 2012, in the audience at a “Recovered Voices” concert in Santa Monica, I found myself speaking to the individual sitting to my right, Louisa Saini. Before the concert began, I asked her about her attraction to the evening’s event. She explained that she respected conductor James Conlon’s reputation, enjoyed chamber music (the focus of the night), and wanted to take advantage of music so near her house. Still, she admitted very honestly that she was “a little uncomfortable” initially that night: she had overheard audience members discussing the composers’ fates and their own Jewish histories. But why this discomfort? Did she feel that she somehow had no right to this concert, that this music was not her own? Was a Jewish identity or historical connection necessarily a part of the evening? Or was this discomfort generated by a clash of conscience—looking forward to the music while acknowledging its violent historical context?

Fast forward to July 11, 2013: in Tablet Magazine James Loeffler addressed performances devoted to the problematic term “Holocaust Music,” concentrating on the activity of Murry Sidlin: “It may sound like heresy to criticize a pious act of Holocaust remembrance. But the true heresy is to turn Jewish composers into shadow images defined only by their status as Hitler’s victims.” Online reactions below Loeffler’s article varied widely. A surprisingly unreflective response from the author of Virtually Jewish, Ruth Ellen Gruber, complained: “I don’t understand his criticism—it smacks of ‘oh, here is someone being praised, I guess I better shoot him down.’” Another poster, Nicole Maratovah Czarnecki, simply seemed stuck on the notion that work in this area is, yes, noble. She asked, “So, why on Earth, indeed, ‘criticize a pious act’?” Is performance connected to the Holocaust so lofty, so personal, as to be beyond reproach?

I offer these two moments as my testament to the many issues evoked by the remarkably vibrant and wide-ranging arena of concertizing currently devoted to music denigrated during the Nazi era. These events arguably represent a powerful circumvention of controversy endemic in the creation of art after Auschwitz—related to the view that the experience of the Holocaust is unspeakable. To date, however, there has been no in-depth scholarly intervention into any aspect of this work. Given the literature limitations as well as the unwieldy reach of the topic, this article is necessarily a starting point—an initial

I would like to thank Michael Beckerman for his honest assessment of an earlier draft of this work. Thank you also to the Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture for their generous support of this research.

1 Louisa Saini, interview with the author (Santa Monica), October 4, 2012.
3 For a provocative discussion of this idea in the evolving work of Theodor W. Adorno and Cathy Caruth, among others, see Thomas Trezise, Witnessing: On the Reception of Holocaust Survivor Testimony (New York: Fordham University Press, 2013). look—confined to analysis of my collected data regarding the places, dates, and repertoire relevant to this realm of performance in the United States, despite its connections to similar and earlier work in other countries. Some early programs worth mentioning, related to varying degrees: the musicologist Anneliese Landau’s “Forbidden Music” concerts in the United States during the 1940s, based in part on her work within Nazi Germany’s Jewish Culture League (Jüdischer Kulturbund); and performances by survivors in Europe in the immediate aftermath of World War II, including Displaced Persons touring ensembles, such as the St. Ottilien Orchestra, as well as individual musicians, like Dutch-born singer and dancer Lin Jaldat (born Rebekka Brilleslijper) and Aleksander Kulisiewicz, who collected and performed the songs of concentration camp prisoners in the 1960s in Germany.

More expansive initial projects of significance include, but are not limited to: the series Musica Viva, a title that first appeared in program pamphlets in September 1947, organized by the composer Karl Amadeus Hartmann in Munich (among the goals of the series was “catch up” with works banned during the Third Reich); and the (West) Berlin Festival (“Berliner Festwochen”) of September 1987, dedicated to “Verdraengte Musik: Berliner Komponisten im Exil”; “musica reanimata,” officially the “Society for the Promotion and Re-discovery of Composers Persecuted by the Nazi Regime and Their Works,” founded in Berlin in 1990; and Decca’s Entartete Musik recordings, based in London. Performance related to music denigrated during the Nazi era has thus hardly been localized solely in the United States; it is a truly transnational enterprise with... simultaneous physical and psychic connections to multiple countries. Yet, this article inevitably exposes uniquely American facets of this work by concentrating on its current manifestation in the United States.

With this focus, my aim is to explore the impulse to effect constructive change currently bolstering such music making. These diverse, yet conceptually positive goals, as I will show, help explain the myriad responses to and potential pitfalls within this work. By highlighting this opposition between noble intention and negative response or repercussion, this article contributes to a small, but growing, body of scholarship exposing the contradictions embedded in efforts to impact society constructively through music. Along these lines, I will raise questions about the role these performances play in a problematic conflation of Nazi-era composition and Jewish music.

Why Recover Suppressed Music?

To begin, let us define “suppressed music.” This larger category often marks musical activity devoted to persecution during the Nazi era and is the title of a significant listserv dedicated to discussion and dissemination of relevant composition and performance. As outlined in a recent call for papers—for a conference in New Zealand entitled “Recovering Forbidden Voices: Responding to the Suppression of Music in World War Two” (August 22–25, 2014)—music suppressed during the Nazi era includes “music written in ghettos, concentration camps, and in exile, along with works classified and banned by the Nazis as ‘Entartete Musik’ [degenerate music].” Performances of “suppressed music” according to this definition can merge several different categories of music making, mixing music banned during the era as well as composers persecuted or forbidden at the time, and thus exiled, interned, or, in the case of some composers labeled “Entartete,” long-deceased—a posthumous persecution. With this complex treatment, suppressed music is a “generic set,” as David Levin and Ken Reinhard recognize, “unbranded” by any one “defining characteristic.”

My representative sampling follows by necessity general use of this complicated category amalgamation (collected through Internet searches and review of news sources using key words within the New Zealand conference definition, and thus limited and no doubt skewed—though at least consistently—by the reach of cyberspace or accessible news media). Based on this data, which netted performances between the late 1980s through 2014, concerts devoted to music suppressed during the Nazi era currently appear to be the regular work of an organized program or individual. To name a few—Michael Christie, James Conlon, Daniel Hope, Mina Miller, Nancy Rubenstein, Judith Sheridan, and 12 See https://www.jiscmail.ac.uk/cgi-bin/webadmin?SHOWTPL=HELP-SUBEDIT&L=SUPPRESSED-MUSIC.

13 One of the earliest of these concerts, entitled “Composers of the Holocaust,” took place on January 28, 1989, at the Emanu-El Midtown Y in New York. It was organized by the artistic director of Downtown Music Productions, Mimi Stern-Wolfe. As Stern-Wolfe recalls, “As far as we knew, very little of all this was known to American audiences.” Mimi Stern-Wolfe, email to the author, August 28, 2013.
Marshall Taylor. Like all concert organizers, these individuals and others involved mediate a variety of social forces. As William Weber observes, “Because most concerts serve a variety of groups with different tastes, desires, and needs, planning a program is a kind of political process.” This process necessitates a balance between artistic integrity or mission and self-preservation, a response to market forces. Such response, for some, lies in the intersection between commerce and art. As conductor Leonard Slatkin explains, “In depressed economies, you must convince reluctant donors to contribute even more money by emphasizing the value of your product to the community.” The nexus of negotiation in concert organization links concerts devoted to music denigrated during the Nazi era with any other musical program. However, concerts of suppressed music can be distinguished by the pronounced specifics of their intention to impact society constructively through music. For evidence of this impulse, I turn to displayed intention in program titles as well as public utterance—all products of mediation and thereby a unique reflection of this political process.

First and foremost, titles often feature “re”—the prefix of return, again. We see this trend in prominent use of the terms “rediscovered” and “recovering” or “recovered” (see Example 1). This word choice points to the goal of revival, defined by ethnomusicologist Tamara Livingston as “social movements which strive to ‘restore’ a musical system believed to be disappearing or completely relegated to the past for the benefit of contemporary society.” James Conlon’s project, “Recovered Voices,” at Los Angeles Opera, a prominent and influential case in point, fits decidedly into this category, especially given its framing in public explanation. In the online “Welcome,” on The OREL site connected to “Recovered Voices,” musicologist Michael Beckerman insists, “Our goal is neither to write eulogies nor to create narratives or ‘spins’ concerning the material we present.” In this way, The OREL Foundation contributes to what Beckerman terms a “dynamic revival.” Conlon himself favors wording highlighting the recovery of a loss and similarly avoids ties to memorialization. In an interview, he explained, “I’m not in the business of memorialization, however noble that is.” Rather, he seeks to mend the perceived German canon, despite recent challenges to this ideal, repairing the “greatest single rupture in what had been a centuries-long stream of German classical music.” This musical recovery, according to Conlon, makes possible a fuller appreciation of a supposed American musical style. He writes, “Further, our own American heritage owes an enormous debt to those who emigrated to Hollywood and Broadway, bringing their distinctive personalities with them, and creating a style that has since evolved into a distinctly American one.”

---

22 “LA Opera Celebrates Nazi-Repressed Composers,” All Things Considered, NPR, March 7, 2007. Conlon wrote similar sentiments in his most complete public explanation of his musical recovery. James Conlon, “Recovering a Musical Heritage: The Music Suppressed by the Third Reich,” http://www.jamesconlon.com/index_new.php?/about/writing_detail/recovering_a_musical_heritage_the_music_suppressed_by_the_third_reich. (This statement is also available on the OREL site.)
23 Conlon, “Recovering a Musical Heritage.”
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Place</th>
<th>Performer(s)</th>
<th>Repertoire</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>“Recovering a Musical Heritage”</td>
<td>March 2003</td>
<td>New York City, NY</td>
<td>James Conlon</td>
<td>Schulhoff, Haas, Klein, Krása, Bartók, Weill, and Zemlinsky</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“Recovered Voices”</td>
<td>March 7, 10, 2007</td>
<td>LA Opera, CA</td>
<td>James Conlon, LA Opera</td>
<td>Schreker, Braunfels, Křenek, Ullmann, Korngold, Zemlinsky, and Schulhoff</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“Recovered Voices: Enduring Masterworks of Composers Almost Silenced by the Nazis”</td>
<td>January 20, 2010</td>
<td>Syracuse University, NY</td>
<td>Syracuse Symphony Orchestra (SSO), the SU Oratorio Society, and the Syracuse International Film Festival</td>
<td>Ravel, Schrecker, Schulhoff, and Zemlinsky</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“Rediscovered Masters”</td>
<td>October 7–9, 2010</td>
<td>Symphony Hall, Phoenix, AZ</td>
<td>Phoenix Symphony</td>
<td>Krása, Weinberg, and Prokofiev</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“Rediscovered Beauty: Suppressed Composers”</td>
<td>March 18, 2011</td>
<td>Daniel Recital Hall at Cal State Long Beach, CA</td>
<td>Ryan Ross and the Cole Conservatory at CSULB</td>
<td>Klein, Ullmann, a set of Yiddish songs, Krása, and Schulhoff</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Example 1: A Sampling of “Re”

For Conlon, such benefit to contemporary society ultimately ensures a sort of posthumous justice. In an NPR interview, he explained: “You cannot undo the injustice of the lost lives[,] of the cruelty. But in the case of the composers you can do the one thing that would have meant the most to them, which is to perform their music.” Conlon, a Roman Catholic, in this way arguably corresponds to the American image of the heroic Gentile. As Tim Cole observes, referencing the main character in Steven Spielberg’s film Schindler’s List (1993), “In American tellings of the ‘Holocaust’ it is either the liberating American Army who are the heroes—the portrayal favoured at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum—or Righteous Gentiles—the portrayal favoured by Spielberg.”

But this pursuit of justice, whether American or not, seems to move beyond Conlon’s aspirations in other programs devoted to this repertoire—programs that seem to suggest in title wording that undoing death is in a way possible. In concerts of suppressed music, reference to some sort of void—silence, darkness, suppression—off-sets imagery related to life or rebirth—“reborn,” “life,” or “live(s)” (see Examples 2 and 3).

---

Example 2: A Sampling of Darkness, Silence, and/or Suppression

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Event Title</th>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Location</th>
<th>Performers</th>
<th>Composers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>“Silent Voices, the Artists of Terezín”</td>
<td>April 18, 1993</td>
<td>Merkin Concert Hall, New York, NY</td>
<td>Mark Luwig, Terezín Chamber Music Foundation, and the Hawthorne Quartet</td>
<td>Klein, Krása, Ullmann, Haas, and Schulhoff</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“Entartete Musik – Music Suppressed by the Nazi</td>
<td>November 9,</td>
<td>Temple Beth Israel, 10462 North 56th Street in Scottsdale, AZ</td>
<td>Musica Nova</td>
<td>Schreker, Humperdinck, Korngold, Mahler, and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Regime”</td>
<td>2003</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Mendelssohn</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“Forbidden Sights and Sounds: Nazi Suppression of</td>
<td>June 2004</td>
<td>Cincinnati Art Museum, OH</td>
<td>University of Cincinnati College-Conservatory of Music</td>
<td>Klein, Schulhoff, Schoenberg, Grosz, and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Art and Culture”</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Strayhorn</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“Out of Darkness: Music from Terezín,”</td>
<td>June 10, 12,</td>
<td>The Theater at St. Catherine of Siena, Riverside, NY</td>
<td>ICE and young stars from the Metropolitan Opera, New York City Opera,</td>
<td>Ullmann</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Greenwich Music Festival</td>
<td>14, 2009</td>
<td></td>
<td>Opera Australia, and La Scala</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“Silenced but not Forgotten”</td>
<td>April 6, 2013</td>
<td>University of California, Irvine, CA</td>
<td>Pianist Nina Scolnik and the Angeles Quartet, among others</td>
<td>Mendelssohn, Schreker, Klein, Korngold, and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Shostakovich</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Example 3: A Sampling of “Reborn,” “Life,” or “Live(s)”

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Event Title</th>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Location</th>
<th>Performers</th>
<th>Composers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>“Music Reborn”</td>
<td>October 26, 2006</td>
<td>Rodef Shalom Congregation in Shadyside, Pittsburgh, PA</td>
<td>Jason Calloway and Nancy Rubenstein</td>
<td>Zeisl, Schulhoff, and Castelnuovo-Tedesco</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“Music Reborn: Forbidden and Forgotten”</td>
<td>October 25, 2009</td>
<td>Carol Ann Reichgut Concert Hall in Seton Hill University's Performing Arts Center, Greensburg, PA</td>
<td></td>
<td>Schulhoff and Ullmann</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Terezín”</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Schul, Ullmann, Krása, Śvenk, Skutečky, and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“And Their Music Lives On”</td>
<td>May 29, 2012</td>
<td>Richmond Symphony Orchestra</td>
<td>Messiaen, Singaglia, and Milhaud</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Generation”</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
This dichotomy of dark and light is complementary in theories of rebirth, allied with revival in one of its earliest musical applications in the work of English folk song collector Cecil Sharp. (Cecil Sharp in his work with the English folk song spoke of both revival and a hope that English music would be “reborn.”) Defined as both reincarnation as well as “the process of being born again during life,” rebirth in either conception is contingent on a form of survival—a confrontation with darkness, injustice, and/or death. This confrontation too has particular resonance in America’s relationship to the Holocaust. After the Holocaust, the notion of rebirth, darkness to light, related to classic myths of salvation, held a specific place in American Jewish thinking about Israel. Richard L. Rubenstein explains, “Death and rebirth are the great moments of religious experience. In the twentieth century the Jewish phoenix has known both … Death in Europe was followed by resurrection in our ancestral home.” This redemptive coloring also operated and continues to operate in American responses to the Holocaust more generally. What many scholars have observed as the Americanization of the Holocaust privileges stories of redemption in tolerance, pluralism, and human rights—all themes significant to the construction of American identity. Romantic thinking about music resonates significantly with these American conceptions of survival and rebirth after the Holocaust. As Hegel proclaimed in lectures during the 1820s, music is “the art of the soul,” a subjective art “directly addressed to the soul.” Through music, a composer—his or her soul—could thereby live on after death, reborn in concert.

Contrasting this goal of musical restoration and posthumous justice, other projects and concerts emphasize terms such as “memory” or “remembering” and “remembrance,” which point to efforts of memorialization and “commemoration” (see Example 4). Mina Miller’s Music of Remembrance (MOR) in Seattle is a significant example of this latter aim. Devoted to “remembering Holocaust musicians and their art,” the group’s concerts of suppressed music as well as new work associated with the Holocaust annually mark the anniversary of Kristallnacht in the fall and Holocaust Remembrance Day each spring. With this emphasis, MOR is explicitly aimed at remembrance, and thus most closely operates within memory work—making the past present. The means of this pastness in the present is commemoration, a complex, symbolic act of collective memory transmission, which, according to historian Geoffrey Cubitt, contributes “distinctively, and in many social settings vitally, to making the past an active rather than a merely passive element in people’s social awareness.” Such activity also represents, in the estimation of Anita Kasabova, scholar of philosophy, a way “to account for unimaginable events caused by our species.” Both conceptions of memory’s work index education, promoting understanding through remembrance.

---

30 Cole, Selling the Holocaust, 82.
33 I should say, I included in my collected data only MOR events that had a definite focus on works suppressed during the Nazi era rather than newly composed music, which, while an intriguing area of music making, is not the focus of the present study.
Example 4: A Sampling of “Memory,” Remembering/Remembrance, or “Commemoration”

Miller emphasized the importance of this aspect of her remembrance—her program operating as a sort of retrospective benefit concert series—in remarks opening MOR’s sixteenth season: “Through music, Music of Remembrance strives to broaden everyone’s understanding of the Holocaust’s many dimensions, and to make clear its significance for all of humanity.”36 In a documentary chronicling MOR’s first decade of work, entitled Unsilenced, Miller connects this mission to her own history, the family she lost in the Holocaust. Through her concerts as well as more explicit efforts of education, such as events in schools, Miller shares “her story.”37

I should mention that MOR’s aims, like Conlon’s intended goals, are not restricted to a single notion of the positive work music can serve in concert. In addition to a primary focus on remembrance, the MOR mission statement reads, “It is a priceless gift that much of this music has survived as moral and artistic defiance in the face of catastrophe. We must ensure that these voices of musical witness be heard.” This emphasis on a moral imperative helps situate MOR and its goals within the realm of revival as well. Though commemoration and revival represent two different impulses, in concertizing devoted to music banned by the Nazis these goals can coexist or at least exist side by side to varying degrees.38

With aspirations to right and/or remember past wrongs, these illustrative programs aim to perform a particular good within society, nuancing the negotiation inherent in the organizing of any concert. And I would argue that the specific repertoire of concerts devoted to suppressed music within my sampling confirms these aims more generally. The popularity in particular of Erwin Schulhoff and Viktor Ullmann (the two composers most often performed at these events) is proof: both composers work within efforts of 36 See http://www.musicofremembrance.org/~musicofr/about/minas-corner.

---

38 See http://www.musicofremembrance.org/~musicofr/page/mission-statement. There is a similar coexistence in the goals of the Terezín Music Foundation, which, since 1991, has worked to recover, preserve, and perform works created by prisoners in Terezín, while also fulfilling “their unrealized artistic and mentoring roles with new commissions by emerging composers,” then performed as an “enduring memorial.” See http://www.terezinmusic.org/mission-history.html.
rebirth, recovery, or rediscovery, and thus revival, given the fascination with the composers’ musical mastery and changing styles (the music itself). They also operate effectively in events focused more directly on death and therefore memory and commemoration, with their respective deaths in concentration camps (there is of course much more to be said in this regard). But the aims sustaining performances of music denigrated during the Third Reich also implicate competing agendas as well as concerns about the ethics of Holocaust representation—all of which can undermine or at least muddy positive intentions.

Uncovering Recovery’s Repercussions

Concerts of suppressed music, especially those featuring artists with little name recognition outside of this area of music making, arguably benefit organizers, offering a platform and visibility founded on the tragedy of others. Programs that openly integrate fundraising invite further skepticism along these lines while, at the same time, underscoring the marketability of the Nazi era (the Holocaust sells, after all). In addition to charges of opportunism or exploitation, hardly new, performances of music denigrated during the Nazi era navigate to varying degrees a precarious balance between music aesthetics and history. Privileging of the music—its worth above all—can invite charges founded in the ethics of Holocaust representation. The revivalist effort to repair a musical rupture and maintain historical continuity arguably conceals trauma, akin to what German studies scholar Eric Santner calls “narrative fetishism.” This charge similarly effects invocations of rebirth, which can hide victimization through focus on survival, as author of Traumatic Realism, Michael Rothberg, argues in his discussion of the movie Schindler’s List.

On the other hand, spotlighting the past in commemoration—the disproportionate reliance on the history of the Nazi era—can lead to one-dimensional readings of the composers concerned—their individual biographies, musical styles, and repertoire subsumed by a larger association with the Holocaust. Within concerts of suppressed music (titles, advertisements, or program notes), the terms “Holocaust musician” and “Holocaust composer” (any grouping of people within a category of “the Holocaust”) further work to conceal the distinctive features of the music and composers involved (see Example 5). Even if we ascribe to this category only music composed within a concentration camp (setting aside the work of composers such as Zemlinsky who actually emigrated in 1938 and subsequently died in 1942 in New York), we, as James Loeffler has recently argued, “severely restrict the rich meanings in and around these works.” To hear this music, as Loeffler makes clear in his work on Soviet music, “we must first start by asking what we gain, and what we lose, in applying our cultural labels to their historical music.”

Ernst Křenek underscored the complexities of his own output and biography in rare direct response to 42 James Loeffler, “‘In Memory of Our Murdered (Jewish) Children’: Hearing the Holocaust in Soviet Jewish Culture,” Slavic Review 73, no. 3 (Fall 2014), 611.

---

similar labeling, in this case the historical designation “degenerate music” in the Los Angeles Philharmonic’s titling of a 1991 event honoring his birthday. “I fail to see what my 90th birthday has to do with ‘entartete Kunst’ (degenerate art). If I should be associated therewith at all, it would seem to be more logical to select a work from the early 20s … instead of the ‘Symphonic Elegy’ which I wrote in this country after that obnoxious concept had long become obsolete.”\(^{43}\) Performances of music denigrated during the Nazi era are thus inherently a “gray zone,” one in which I myself entered, as Mike Beckerman reminded me, in the very writing of this article. Am I somehow complicit in the violence of the Holocaust when I write about it?

| “Hope Survives: The Lost Generation of Holocaust Composers” | March 25, 2012 | The Amado Recital Hall, 34th and Spruce Streets, University of Pennsylvania, PA | The Meiravi Quartet | Ullmann, Schulhoff, Krása, Zemlinsky, among others |

Example 5: A Sampling of “the Holocaust” in Title Wording

On top of this unstable terrain I would like to add consideration of what I read as a misleading correlation within some concertizing of suppressed music between the Holocaust and Jewish music. This final issue has to do with a confirmed, but also assumed Jewishness, so to speak, in concert focus, geography, and venue. First, concert focus: though not all composers persecuted during the Third Reich were Jewish, by Hitler’s estimation or their own, many programs in this realm of music making specifically highlight Jewish composers or music. To point out but a few examples, Judith Sheridan’s “Forbidden Voices” features “songs by Jewish composers which were banned by Nazis in the 1930s”; a concert on April 10, 2010, in Santa Rosa, California, was titled “Music at the Edge of Life: In Remembrance of Jewish Composers Who Perished in the Holocaust”; Michael Christie’s “Rediscovered Masters” concerts of July 7, 8, and 27, 2011, honored “the music of Jewish composers who were silenced during World War II.” Second, spatial spread and venue: to date, programs of music denigrated during the Nazi era have appeared in at least twenty-two different states, pointing to strong interest in the Holocaust throughout the United States. Such interest is bolstered by the celebratory role the Nazi era plays in the American self-image\(^ {44} \) as well as the power of dark tourism.\(^ {45} \) But the popularity of these performances in New York, Arizona, and, above all, California (especially southern California) clearly reveals a Jewish connection (Los Angeles, of course also the eventual home of many émigré composers, now boasts the fourth largest Jewish population in the world, behind New York City, Tel Aviv, and Jerusalem). This, albeit brief, explanation of concert geography is confirmed by regular use of Jewish spaces as performance venues: synagogues or, in the case of the April 17, 2012, concert of Ullmann’s music, centers for Jewish learning, such as Chicago’s Spertus.

\(^{44} \) Cole, Selling the Holocaust, 155.

Given these explicit Jewish connections, it may come as no surprise that there can be assumptions of Jewishness attached to programs that lack a singular focus on a supposed Jewish repertoire—an example, “Recovered Voices.” Conlon’s program actively avoids formal circumscription of its repertoire as Jewish given what Christopher Koelsch, CEO of LA Opera, views as a potential danger of re-ghettoizing the music and composers involved. The San Francisco Classical Voice nonetheless described Conlon’s project under the heading “Conlon to Direct Jewish Music Project.” Similarly, Naomi Pfefferman in the Jewish Observer article “The Best of (Jewish) Los Angeles 2008” included “Recovered Voices” under the category “Best Places to See Jewish Opera,” again labeling the project Jewish.

Such association, confirmed or assumed, has a contextual foundation in part in a history of investment in the Holocaust within American Jewish communities. This investment has been and still is tied directly to self-identification as Jewish in the United States. In 1999, Peter Novick in fact recognized a potential fate in the Holocaust as the sole common link between American Jews. But this tie also relates to broader treatments of Jewish music today, channeling the ongoing problem of defining Jewish music. In “What is Jewish Music?” sponsored by the Jewish Virtual Library (“excerpted from the Jewish Music Institute in London”), Jewish music is today assigned several categories: Ashkenazi Music (Klezmer), Sephardi Music, Israeli Music, Synagogue Music, Western Classical Music, and Suppressed Music. Similarly, the ethnomusicologist Jeff Janeczko, based on his work on contemporary secular Jewish music in America, identifies “unconscious assumptions about what could be admitted into a canon of 47 Christopher Koelsch, phone interview with the author, August 18, 2012. Michael Haas similarly writes, there is a risk—a “heffalump trap”—in the “re-ghettoization of Jewish composers”: “Mirror-imaging Nazi policies in order to resurrect the composers they banned may be inevitable, but taking them from one ghetto and plunking them into another can be a real danger.” Michael Haas, “Where to Start or How to Start? (Part 1),” The OREL Foundation, http://orelfoundation.org/index.php/journal/journalArticle/where_to_start_or_how_to_start/. Even the designation “Recovered Voices” has the potential to mark the included composers as other—separate—as they were segregated during the Nazi era. For that reason, in part, Conlon hopes ultimately to include his project’s repertoire in regular concert programming, with no special branding as “project.” That is, he hopes the music will take its rightful place, based solely on musical value, in standard musical literature, making the need for his program obsolete. James Conlon, interview with the author (Los Angeles, CA), October 8, 2012.

---

50 Marilyn Ziering, a Los Angeles-based philanthropist, it should be mentioned, does bring to the project a more prominent Jewish connection, with her sponsorship of the project, inspired by her father’s love of opera and her late husband’s survival in a concentration camp. In a “Q&A” within the Santa Monica “Recovered Voices” concert program, she explained, “I believe that when someone writes something, part of the spirit of the person is in their work. If we bring back the compositions of these artists destroyed by the Nazis, we help to keep them alive.” See “Q&A with Marilyn Ziering,” Program—Recovered Voices, Santa Monica, October 4, 2012: 42.

‘authentically Jewish’ music”: “the pre-war, the holocaust related, or the Israeli.” In scholarship as well, especially in Germany, we see this union between the Third Reich and Jewish music in the decades following the Holocaust. As musicologist Tina Frühauf demonstrates, most studies in German musical scholarship after World War II discuss Jewish music or musicians in “the context of Nazi Germany, the Holocaust, or in relationship to anti-Semitism.” At the national meeting of the American Musicalological Society in 2012, Florian Scheding similarly commented on the close relationship between Jewish music and Exilforschung (exile studies in Germany). He argued that discussion of the music of composers displaced after Hitler’s assumption of power has become a proxy for investigating Jewish music. Jewish music for many is synonymous with music of Nazi persecution.

By bringing my discussion of the performance of suppressed music into this larger consideration of Jewish music, I hope to offer several final thoughts. This concertizing arises from positive intentions connected to rebirth, revival, and commemoration—“pious” perhaps. Still, like other efforts to effect constructive change through music, this area of performance is fraught with identity issues, perhaps the root of Saini’s “discomfort” in Santa Monica, issues resulting from a complicated jumbling of history, music, and present self-identification through the past. With awareness of these competing layers, we in music can attend to the responsible handling of so-called suppressed music—and even work in scholarship as well as concert presentation to untangle, with an eye toward understanding, an increasingly confused popular merging of the Nazi era, Jewishness, and music. This call counters the evasion identified by David Engel in his book Historians of the Jews and the Holocaust, a decided division between Jewish studies and the history of the Holocaust based in part on academic concerns about the Holocaust’s ability to divert “attention from how Jews themselves lived and what they created to the awful circumstances of their death.” By confronting the popular discourse—a discourse that continues, and even intensifies, despite the stance of academics—I wonder if we can avoid future support or confirmation of the notion that all music with any relationship to the Holocaust is Jewish. This notion shrouds distinction within this repertoire, similar to the havoc wreaked by the term “Holocaust music.” But it also fuels misleading imaginings of Jewish music today, a flame in turn fanned by the enduring problem of Jewish music in definition. Though a sign of evolution and even a sort of anti-essentialism (a new circumscription of Jewish music that is not based on ancestry or accepted ethnic musical markers), the idea that Jewish music is Holocaust-related to me still hearkens back to one-dimensional thinking that denies the complexities of the music involved. It also may support wider ossification of Jewish music as an entity of the past. As Philip Bohlman writes, “Jewish music in Europe today lives and relives through historicism. Since the reunification of Europe, no less than in the six decades or more since the Holocaust, Jewish music has increasingly come to function as a means of performing the past.” In seeming contradiction, Jewish music thereby lives and changes in the present as a music of memorial, trauma, and ultimately negation.

--

By raising this concern, it is not my goal to disparage the performance of suppressed music. Instead, I intend primarily to encourage discussion and, yes, criticism of concertizing in this realm. At a recent symposium entitled “Music, Censorship and Meaning in Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union: Echoes and Consequences” (Los Angeles, August 9–10, 2014), James Conlon expressed some concern about the effects of criticism on the dissemination of his recovered repertoire, suggesting that the public must first be allowed a “taste.” There have in the past been much harsher reactions to criticism of works tied to trauma. For example, some who found manipulative John Corigliano’s Symphony No. 1, which addresses the issue of AIDS, were labeled homophobes. In the controversial 1994 article “Discussing the Undiscussable,” dance writer Arlene Croce, seemingly aware of such criticism, expressed her disapproval of personal trauma in art by commenting on her decision not to review Bill T. Jones’s Still/Here, which explores AIDS in music, dance, and video. Frustrated by the privileging of self in this “victim art,” Croce insisted, “By working dying people into his act, Jones is putting himself beyond the reach of criticism.”

We have seen similar sentiment in response to Loeffler, sentiment Loeffler himself foresaw (“it might seem like heresy to criticize …”). It is not just the experience of the Holocaust that has then been viewed as unspeakable. Critical response to any expression of that experience has also been deemed inexpressible. Thomas Trezise has argued that belief in the Holocaust’s unsplicable “appears to stand in for a refusal to listen.” I would argue that any prohibition on discussion or criticism extends that refusal.

Abstract

Current performance of music denigrated during the Nazi era is remarkably vibrant, wide-ranging, and transnational. To date, however, there has been no in-depth scholarly intervention into any aspect of this work. Given the literature limitations as well as the unwieldy reach of the topic, this article is necessarily a starting point—an initial look—confined to analysis of my collected data regarding the places, dates, and repertoire relevant to this realm of music making in the United States, despite its connections to similar work in other countries. This article also focuses on the impulse to effect constructive change bolstering such performance—the diverse, yet conceptually positive, goals that help explain the depth and breadth of concertizing devoted to music denigrated during the Nazi era.

And yet, as I explore, affirmative aims and aspirations are complicated by potential pitfalls, negative ramifications, as well as the ethics of Holocaust representation. By examining this opposition, this article contributes to a small, but growing, body of scholarship exposing the contradictions embedded in efforts to impact society constructively through music. Along these lines, I argue that performances dedicated to music persecuted during the Third Reich can promote a problematic conflation of Nazi-era composition and Jewish music, circumscribing all Holocaust-related music as Jewish music.

58 Tim Page, “Love the Art, Hate the Artist: Moral Questions are Unavoidable, but They Have No Answers,” Washington Post, November 19, 1995.
60 Trezise, Witnessing Witnessing, 211.